But she had lost him. That so onful look in his eyes could never soften to one of love.

No explanation seemed possible.

And Elsie Mayburn buried her face in her trembling little hands and cried like a child.

The patrol warm to an end.

The patrol warm drew up in front of the West Thirtleth Street Police Station and disgorged its load.

The women trooped into the station-house escorted by the police.

A bluecoat informed them that they were to be herded in a rear room, and then taken in blocks of five before the capiain, there to give their politices and be consigned to cells for the night.

Elsie-brought up in a peaceful country home—heard this news with a new fear.

The squalid surroundings blurred before her eyes and the room seemed to rock and swim about her.

She tottered, and would have fallen.

A strong arm suddenly encircled her waist and her droeping head fell back against a broad shoulder.

A feeling of utter, peace and contentment thrilled her; a feeling she had never known before.

It lasted but a second.

Then her strength returned, and with it a realization of her situation.

She looked in linto the eyes of the man who held her.

"You?" she gasped. "You, here?".

"You?" she gasped. "You, here?".

Thereupon Fred C. Emde, one of the members of the board, ordered notice to be served upon him to appear and explain what had become of the other $1,60 worth of diamonds.
